JUDGING GUIDELINES

All the entries must be the final-year project and the jury will judge those works according to the following criteria:

- Concept
- Spatial integration

The design should respond and be sensitive to its context and also the way users interact with the space. Although the floors are separated, the design should present some form of integration—how it benefits or impacts the building and its users should be in place. This could be pursued by means of the building form and function or any criteria already set here. There should be an integration of access and circulation in the scheme. An overall sense of place needs to be established to give the neighborhood space a unique character, enhance the walking environment, and create satisfaction in individual and whole space integration.

- Goal
- Form

The jury will consider how the project's form reveal the project's goal through its materiality, shape, detailing, etc. The project's form should have a clear stance on its relationship to its surroundings, its users, and the public at large. It is not enough to be beautiful, and the form need not be cutting-edge or trendy, but rather of high quality, and is appropriate and relevant for its users and the message it is supporting. The project should demonstrate design excellence and quality, that it should fit its purpose and that it should be sustainable. There should also be harmony between the proposed interior designs and the building itself.

- Functionality of the design

Function refers to achieving the goal which is set by the applicant. This is frequently a complex and diversity of requirements that can range from the simple living space to the complicated social interactions. The jury will refer to the project's description to understand which functional criteria was the primary concern.

Good functionality means the project works well for the intended use, including for its users, that occupy the project, and the public that encounters it.

- Innovation and originality of the design solution

This is one of the key components of architectural design to embrace new technologies and countenances shifting social and demographic trends with curiosity. Projects that take a fresh approach, work to improve existing practices, and push the boundaries or perceptions in the field are innovative projects.
